Product Liability Claims

Our specialist product liability lawyers can help if you have been injured from a defective product

Our team are experienced in dealing with faulty product claims ranging from products that have been purchased in shops or online, to defective implants used for medical purposes, such as breast or hip implants.

What is a faulty product?

A 'product' can include goods, electricity and the component parts of any product. Under the Consumer Protection Act 1987, all products must be of satisfactory quality – they must not be faulty or damaged; they should be fit for purpose and as described.

All products – whether physical or digital – must meet these specific standards. If a product doesn't work properly or, for example, doesn't match the description or example shown online, you can claim if the defect causes death damage or injury.

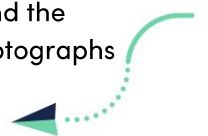

Generally, a product will not be considered defective if a safer version is later put on the market.

What happens if I am injured by an unsafe product?

If you have been injured or fallen ill due to a faulty product, you will need to show that the product was unsafe, and that this was linked to the injury or illness you sustained. You won't need to establish that the manufacturer was negligent, only that their product contributed to your injury.

To make a claim for compensation, the injury must have occurred within the last three years, so it's important you get in touch with a specialist lawyer as soon as you think you may have a claim.

You should keep a hold of the product and the original purchase receipt, and taking photographs can also be helpful.

Product Liability Claims

In assessing a products safety, the court will take into account all of the circumstances, including:

- all aspects of the marketing of the product
- the use of any trademarks
- instructions and warnings
- what might reasonably be expected to be done with the product at the time it was supplied.
