Public Liability Claims

Our expert team of personal injury lawyers can help you with a public liability claim if you have been injured in a public place

Accidents in public places are common and if you have been injured in a public place or on public property our lawyers can help you seek compensation for your pain and suffering.

What type of accidents would be considered public liability?

Public liability accidents can include:

- a slip or a trip on uneven or broken steps
- a fall on an uneven road surface
- objects falling from height causing injury
- a trip in a public area or inside an establishment open to the public.

In most cases the third parties – usually local authorities, landlords, retailers or housing associations – are held accountable in these types of claims. Our lawyers can quickly identify who is at fault for your accident and raise an action for compensation on your behalf.

How do I make a claim?

If you want to make a claim for an injury in a public place, you need to make sure that you have reported the accident to the correct body, and that the accident is accurately recorded.

If you can, try to take photographs of the area where your accident happened and of what caused your injury. It is also useful to obtain the names and contact details of any witnesses to your accident.

As well as seeking compensation for pain and suffering, we can sometimes recover loss of earnings, cost of any care or support required and any out of pocket expenses, depending on your circumstances.

There is a three-year time limit on pursuing a claim for personal injury, so if you think you have been injured as a result of a public liability accident that wasn't your fault contact one of our personal injury lawyers right away.
